Economic Commentary

Global risk markets were solely driven by the actions of central banks during the quarter. The Bank of Japan provided a boost to markets early in the quarter through its quantitative easing program, while the Federal Reserve disappointed investors with hints of scaling back asset purchases. Market participants reacted to the Federal Reserve Chairman Bernanke's testimony to Congress in May during which he indicated that the Fed could begin reducing its $85 billion in monthly asset purchases at one of its next few meetings if improvements in economic growth seemed sustainable. U.S. Treasury rates, credit markets and equities weakened. The sell-off in Treasuries and risk markets was even more aggressive after the June 19th FOMC meeting when the Fed reiterated the possibility of scaling back asset purchases later in the year and added that purchases may end in mid-2014 if incoming data is consistent with the Fed's "rosy" forecasts. Although the Fed reinforced that its policies would be data dependent, investors reacted negatively, sending the ten-year Treasury yield over 2.60% in June, from just 1.63% on May 1st. All fixed income sectors suffered during the sell-off, with emerging markets and high yield bonds getting hit especially hard. Bond mutual funds and ETFs experienced approximately $80 billion in outflows in June as investors began to see the era of "easy money" concluding sooner than anticipated.

While the macro strategy outlook for a global sub-trend recovery has not changed, it is reflective of the rapidly shifting dynamics of the fixed income markets. The sharp correction in asset prices during May and June challenged the premise that asset prices would remain supported by highly accommodative monetary policy. However, the sell-off in markets was not due to central bank tightening. Rather, yields rose as increased volatility led to the liquidation of positions whose values had been supported by unprecedented central bank accommodation, even as dealer balance sheets have radically shrunk. While the Fed seems to be losing faith in the benefits of quantitative easing and appears to be testing the markets for a rational way to end the program, it is worth noting that they are unlikely to ever sell their existing holdings, as Bernanke confirmed following the most recent Fed meeting. Thus far, the improvement in U.S. housing, auto sales and employment has been balanced by the recent rise in U.S. mortgage rates, potential further effects of sequester fiscal cuts, the recession in Europe and tighter Chinese lending standards. Despite benign growth and inflationary pressures, more widespread fixed income mutual fund redemptions could trigger a destructive rise in interest rates. The recent market correction has been severe, but should create a buying opportunity as long as the fundamentals do not change.
